Review: Padukone's son is a significant portion of the film's overall appeal, but that interest doesn't lead to a satisfactory, full-on buy-in for the audiences in South Asia, unless one was heavily invested in the cast from the get-go. It's great that what seems like a classic Bollywood romance is headed by two dynamic actors as the leads, but the "one-night stand" premise is a letdown that goes nowhere, and the story of an entire decade — the 1960s, in this case — is very familiar territory to most people who have seen one version or another of the last few musical hits in the country. As with an old flame that you've been out of touch with for a few years, a glimpse of what might have been can be alluring and salacious, but the film doesn't quite have the finesse or the grasp to come close to that kind of intensity and sureness of purpose, no matter how well-staged the set pieces. There's a big difference between chasing after an old flame and going after a person whom you actually think you want to marry, but even when Padukone's Leela becomes her own woman, Ram is still the first man in her life who she's more than a little interested in. They're both young, attractive, and driven by youthful lusts and unfulfilled dreams, but the characters don't make enough of the dynamism that might have brought them together in the first place. The film is well-shot, with handsome visuals and some lovely songs, but for many, it will be a lot easier to recall moments of time spent with the film than with the actors themselves. There's nothing here that will make you root for the two leads in this relationship or feel that there's a through-line to their stories, and it's the early hook, rather than the charm or the chemistry, that earns the audience's attention.
